We left behind five months ago three boys, all of them were software employees, who were setting out for a summer break, first by plane, second by train, and another one by sea. Each one of the boys seeing in totally different setting had at first experienced the feeling that he has of little importance in the world as a whole. The world seemed so large and he seemed very small but all the boys one after other put serious thoughts away when faced with a good meal, on the train, on the plane, or on the board ship.

Nothing of any important moment happened to the boy who took the train to the north. As with the other two at the back of their thought was very little hope that while away from home they might meet their friends and latter on marry her and have a home of their own. truth, this was just as well because they found the north rather cold, having spent the twenty years of their young life in the south. So at the end of five weeks back they were at the office and quite happy to be there once more. It was, after all, comfortable to be among the people and the things they knew best.

With the boy who went by sea things took a wholly different course. Bill, as his friends called him cutting short his name, was a remarkably beautiful boy, a boy with simple and trusting nature. He naturally had the young girls at her feet at the end of the first evening. It pleased him to find that he was not like some of the less lovely boys, left on his own and he took the young girls at face value acting towards them as he would act towards his own three sisters. That their feelings towards him might not be those of a sister did not at first coming was his nature. However as the days passed he began to sort out the girls he liked from those whom he did not care for and after another day or two he found himself continuously in the company of two of them, one of them was turning for law and the other was in her first year as a secondary modern teacher. Each of those young girls asked him to marry them, and he replied in negative to both of them. The school teacher did not trouble him any more after that and paid attention to another boy. The second young girl asked him repeatedly and in the end agreed.
